Class of 1960

For the members of the junior class this was a year of decision and hard work. It offered new horizons for some and widened them for others. Often the members of the class found themselves faced with responsibilities for which many were unprepared. The juniors form the stabilizing class. They no longer lack experience and maturity as do the sophomores, but still they are not considered quite so capable as the seniors. During this year of decision the juniors began to realize the value of an education and how to profit from other's mistakes. They were faced with decisions for the future—colleges and professions. Although the work was difficult, it was not a year of all work and no play. Acquaintances made became firmly established, and activities such as the Junior-Senior Prom will remain as vivid memories long after geometry problems have faded away. For these reasons the juniors will cherish the memory of their class. The juniors move on to their final year with a sound sense of values. They have received a foundation, but what they construct is left to them. They leave their class with the hope that next year's juniors will realize the value of their high school years and will spend them well.
